On the Spanish Main

(Original.)

About a century and a half ago a young Spaniard, Don Jose Clemente, a gentleman of Madrid with adventurous tastes, enlisted on the schooner Libertad (Liberty), that had fitted out at Cadiz to prey on English commerce on the Spanish main. During the cruise the war between the two countries ended, and Captain Demonio, who commanded the vessel, decided to turn pirate. He announced his intention to the crew and offered to land any of them who did not wish to join in the enterprise on one of the Bahama islands, but so many of them requested to be put ashore that he reconsidered his proposition and forced them to remain and act as pirates.

Jose Clemente, who belonged to one of the first families in Spain, was appalled at being obliged to turn pirate. He was a brave man, but knew that if he so much as lifted a finger for resistance he would be murdered. He therefore determined to bide his time, convinced Demonio that he was with him heart and soul and secretly became the leader of those who were forced to be pirates against their will.

One of the first vessels captured was an English ship, lured to destruction by Demonio, since her captain, supposing Demonio did not know that the war had closed and that he could convince him of the fact, made no defense. The Britisher carried an English gentleman, Sir Thomas Sanderson, who was going out to assume the governorship of one of the Bahamas. His family were with him, including a daughter, Helen Sanderson, a girl of twenty.

When this family were marched aboard the Libertad, a deathly pallor on every face, Jose Clemente resolved that he would save them or die with them. He told the captain that he suspected Sir Thomas to be very rich and able to pay an enormous ransom. This he did to excite the captain's cupidity and gain time. The plan worked so well that instead of forcing the gentleman and his family to walk the plank the captain confined them in the cabin. Clemente also got the captain's permission to retain several of the Englishmen for the crew, thus adding to the number of his own adherents, so that, counting the two divisions, he found there were a dozen men he could rely on to twenty who would stand by the captain. All this was facilitated by Clemente's speaking a little English, while the captain could neither speak nor understand a word but his own tongue. The captain directed Clemente to arrange for a ransom, but Demonio was present at the interview, and although he could not understand English, Clemente did not dare risk any betrayal of his intentions. Sir Thomas was of course glad of an opportunity to pay a ransom, but Clemente knew the plan would be impracticable for the pirates.

Then came one of the crew and told Clemente that three men had joined those opposed to piracy, making fifteen. Clemente resolved to make an attempt to capture the ship. He arranged to take care of the captain himself and appointed his men, each one to kill or bind or otherwise dispose of one of the pirates. This left only two men unprovided for. But as soon as Sir Thomas could be released he would be added to Clemente's force. Every man on both sides was well armed, and there was, besides, a goodly stock of weapons in the cabin reserved for an armory, of which the captain kept the key on his person.

The captain the day after the capture gave up the feasibility of securing a ransom without too great danger of being entrapped, and at 10 o'clock at night told Clemente that Sir Thomas and his family should walk the plank the next morning. Clemente met one of his men on deck and whispered to him to pass the word that at eight bells, midnight, each man was to attack the man assigned him. The first four to dispatch their men were to rush on deck and attack the watch. Then it must be a free fight.

At the last tap of the midnight bell, when the new watch was starting up, the attack commenced. Three pirates were stabbed in their bunks. On the new watch pirates and honest men were equally divided, and the pirates lost one of their side. Clemente's men were instructed to use the dagger or cut-throat, but their opponents used firearms. This awakened the captain, who, as he opened his cabin door, was shot by Clemente. Clemente then went on deck, where he found the old watch (all pirates) standing paralyzed. Clemente shot two of them, and at the same moment two of his own men came up from below. One of the watch was thrown overboard and the others plied. Then Clemente and his two men went to the fore-castle, where the remnant of the pirates were making a last stand against eight or ten assailants. Clemente shouted that their captain was killed and called on them to surrender. They did so, and the ship was saved.

Clemente went immediately to the cabin where the Sanderson family were confined and explained what had occurred. Lady Sanderson swooned for joy, while Helen and the children looked at their deliverer as they would view an angel sent down from heaven to save them. Clemente took the ship into Jamaica, where he delivered those of the pirates who had not been killed, including the captain, whose wound was not mortal, to the authorities. Every man of them was hanged.

There is no doubt that Clemente would have captured the ship in time, but it was the arrival on board of the Sanderson family and the sight of Helen Sanderson's agonized face that led him to act at once. In time she rewarded him with her hand.
